Barbershop Owner Pushes Employees to Be Owners, Too

BRIAN WILLIAMS, anchor:
Our Friday night Making a Difference report comes to us from a viewer who watches us on the NBC station WMAQ in Chicago who told us about his barber, a man who's discovered the key to success is sharing the wealth of what he's learned along the way. And we get his story tonight from NBC's Ron Mott.

JEROME WILLIAMS: I work at both stores or whatever, but I'll take care of them.

RON MOTT, reporting:
For Jerome Williams, taking care of number one means taking care of others. What was interesting is the location in a grocery store, how does that worked out?

J. WILLIAMS: Fantastic.

MOTT: He's a fixture at his four J's Barber Shops in northern Indiana outside Chicago, an operation that started humbly five years ago with three barbers and now boasts thirty-seven.

J. WILLIAMS: I took guys who didn't have any kind of clientele and put them in a place where a lot of people needed haircut.

MOTT: After a career in the Marines, Williams went to nursing school but was honest with himself and got out.

J. WILLIAMS: I realized that you don't want a person in health care that's just doing it for money.

MOTT: So he tried his hand at barbering. And with his personality and penchant for wooing people has built a successful business as diverse behind the razors and scissors as those underneath them.

PENNEE TIBIN (Barber): I just like his-- the way that he focuses on business and like, how he makes things happen.

MOTT: Williams isn't merely satisfied with giving opportunities, he mentors, teaching his crew the ups and downs of ownership. Ivan Duncan has joined those ranks, partnering with Williams in a shop that opened this summer at O'Hare Airport.

IVAN DUNCAN: Jerome gave me that opportunity to work 24/7, said you could make as much money if you like.

J. WILLIAMS: 1.6 million is the goal…

MOTT: Though Williams clearly has financial goals for himself, seeing others reach theirs motivates him to keep J's growing one barber at a time.

MAN: Perfect.

J. WILLIAMS: It's important for me to help barbers become owners because once you're an owner then you can help others.

MOTT: A philosophy he never wants to see out of style.

J. WILLIAMS: It's good.

WILLIAMS: And a reminder, we are always looking for people who are making a difference. You can nominate someone in your life, in your community, share their story with us on our website then perhaps see it here on our broadcast.
